

There are many areas in which the United States (as well as all other sovereign countries) could and should make changes to improve the lives of citizens. Some of these areas are highly controversial, while others receive little public attention. Each of the buttons below provides a short, one to six page vignette describing the problem and possible solutions. They are not exhaustively researched, and the solutions are certainly not represented as the best possible.

The purpose of these short vignettes is to invite knowledgeable and concerned citizens to comment on the descriptions of the problem, and to improve, or possibly reject, suggested solutions. Comments will be incorporated into the vignettes. If, and when, sufficient comments are received, and specific solutions are supported by a number of people, by name, they will be forwarded to individuals in position to implement them.
